1. Who you're looking for

Not every trainer is worth your time. Target trainers who will actually convert and stick:

- Online or hybrid coaches already selling coaching (link in bio, application form, DM funnel). If they don't sell coaching, there's nothing to switch.
- 10 to 100 clients. Below that they don't feel the pain; above that they're harder to move.
- Drowning in admin. Look for complaints about check-ins, DMs, spreadsheets, "so many messages." That's your opening line.
- Niches that fit: gym training, bodybuilding, powerlifting, strength. Bonus if they're in an underserved community where trust travels fast.
- Skip: trainers who only post content with no coaching offer, brand-new coaches with no clients, anyone whose whole identity is a competing app.

Quality beats quantity. Five conversations with the right trainers beat fifty cold DMs to the wrong ones.

2. Channels, ranked

1. Instagram / TikTok DMs. Highest return per hour. Trainers live in their DMs and read them. Personal, direct, and you can see instantly whether they fit.

2. In person. Trainers you know, trainers at your gym, coaches you've worked with. Warm beats cold every time. One real conversation outperforms a week of DMs.

3. Stories and posts to your followers. Lower conversion per view, but it compounds: every post works while you sleep, and trainers who follow you self-select. Best for affiliates with a fitness audience.

Do all three. DMs are the hunting; posts are the farming.

3. Message architecture: what makes a trainer reply

Every high-performing outreach message has four parts, in this order. Keep the whole thing under 100 words.

1. The hook (personalized). One specific thing about them. Not "love your content." Name the thing: their client transformations, a program they run, a complaint they posted. This is what separates you from spam. If you can't write a real hook, don't send.

2. Credibility (one line). Who you are and why you're worth 30 seconds. "I coach / I train / I create fitness content" plus one proof point if you have it.

3. The pitch (one line). The trainer's pain, not the feature list. "It's the thing that reads your check-ins and tells you who needs attention each morning, so you're not doing admin at midnight."

4. The ask (low friction). Never "jump on a call." Offer the easy yes: "Open to a 2-minute video of what it does?" or "Want a login to click around?"

What kills replies: long messages, feature dumps, hype ("game-changer," "revolutionary"), asking for a call in the first message, and anything that reads as copy-pasted.

4. Templates (your voice: first person, short sentences, no em dashes)

Cold DM (Instagram / TikTok)

> Hey [Name], been following your coaching for a while. Your [specific thing, e.g. offseason programs for your guys] stood out.
>
> Quick one: I'm working with Axiom, we're building a coaching platform for online trainers. It basically reads your check-ins and tells you who needs attention each morning, so you're not buried in DMs at night.
>
> We're letting a small group of trainers try it free and help shape it. Open to a 2-min video of what it looks like?

Warm DM (mutual follow, prior interaction)

> Hey [Name], hope training's going well. Wanted to run something by you since you're actually in the coaching game.
>
> I'm partnered with Axiom on their trainer platform. It handles the annoying parts: check-in triage, it flags who went quiet, drafts your replies. You just press send.
>
> Free while it's invite-only. Want me to get you a look?

Follow-up nudge (4 to 5 days, no reply)

> Hey [Name], floating this back up in case it got buried. Happy to just send the 2-min video, no call needed.

Second follow-up (10 to 14 days, no reply — last touch)

> Last nudge from me [Name]. The invite spots are limited and I'd rather they go to coaches I actually rate. Let me know if you want in, no worries either way.

Then stop. A third nudge flips you from persistent to annoying.

If they reply positively

> Love it. Two options: I can send you a quick video walkthrough, or get you a login to click around yourself. Which is easier? Also curious, what's the most annoying part of managing your clients right now?

That last question is gold. Send every answer to the Axiom team. It's product research they can't buy.

Story / post caption

> Trainers: what if your check-ins read themselves? I've been using Axiom's coaching dashboard. It flags who needs attention each morning and drafts the reply. I just press send. Free up to 5 clients. Link in bio if you want a look. #ad

Say the disclosure out loud in video, on screen, before the link.

In person (gym, event, mutual friend)

Keep it conversational, not pitchy: "What are you using to manage your clients right now?" Listen. Then: "There's this thing I'm partnered with, it basically does your check-in triage for you. Want me to send you a look?" Get their Instagram handle before you leave.

5. Personalization: the 30-second research checklist

Before any cold DM, spend 30 seconds on their profile and find one of these:

- A specific program, offer, or transformation they're proud of
- A complaint about admin, DMs, check-ins, or their current software
- Their niche stated plainly (women's strength, powerlifting, etc.)
- A recent post you genuinely reacted to Use exactly one in the hook. One real detail beats three generic compliments.

6. Brand alignment: your page is the real pitch

Trainers check your profile before they reply. Your page does half the selling before your message gets read.

- Niche fit. If you post gym content and train yourself, a strength coach takes you seriously. If your page is random lifestyle content, expect lower reply rates. You don't need a huge following; you need a legible one.
- Look like someone who trains. Recent training content, real captions, real engagement. A dead or bought-looking page kills trust instantly.
- Bio hygiene. Your Axiom link and a one-line description of what you do. If a trainer can't tell who you are in five seconds, they won't reply.
- Engagement authenticity. Trainers can spot bot followers and engagement pods. Clean it up before you start outreach.
- Post about the product. Even two or three genuine posts using the dashboard or the app change everything. "This person actually uses it" is the strongest credibility signal you have.

Blunt version: the affiliates who convert best are the ones whose page makes the trainer think "this person gets my world."

7. Follow-up cadence

Day	Action
0	First DM
4 to 5	Nudge (only if no reply)
10 to 14	Last touch (only if no reply)
After that	Stop. Move on.

If they reply at any point, the cadence ends and it's a conversation. Never automate DMs. One thoughtful message beats a hundred automated ones, and automation gets accounts flagged.

8. What not to do

- No mass automation, bots, or bought DM lists. Ever. It gets accounts banned and poisons the well for every other affiliate.
- No earnings claims. Don't promise a trainer they'll make money, get clients, or grow. Talk about the product, not outcomes.
- No claims from the playbook's "Do not claim" list. No fake stats, no fake endorsements, no medical claims.

- No trash-talking competitors by name in a way that could read as defamation. "I prefer Axiom because..." is fine; "Trainerize is a scam" is not.
- No spamming someone else's comments or lives with your pitch. That's how you get blocked by the whole niche.
- Disclose every time. "#ad" in the post, said out loud in video, before the link. This is law, not etiquette.

9. Handoff and tracking

When a trainer says yes:

1. Send them to axiomtraining.io and tell the Axiom team who you referred (DM or email inquiries@axiomtraining.io with their handle). Access is invite-only, so the team needs the name to let them in and attribute them to you.
2. Keep a simple log: name, handle, date contacted, replied (Y/N), onboarded (Y/N), notes. A notes app is fine.
3. Pass along their "most annoying part" answers. That's product gold.

Your commission starts when their first paid invoice posts. The free plan earns nothing, which is fine: free trainers who love it upgrade when they grow, and their clients subscribe behind them either way.
